

Internet Job Search

If the job search is hard, why add to the stress by using the internet?

You can access current information at all hours of the day or night.

The internet does not recognize holidays, it's there when you are ready to use, even after midnight.

You can reach deeper into your local area as well as take your search far beyond your regular boundaries.

There are no geographic limits. There may be employers who would prefer to hire from their local area, but that doesn't mean you can't accept the job and, if it's worth it, pay for your own move.

Using the internet for your search demonstrates leading-edge skills.

Whether you found the job listing online or did research online before your interview, make sure you tell the employer. This means you not only know how to use a computer but you also know how to navigate the internet.

Below are just a few of the many job search websites for you to check out:

<http://www.careerinfonet.org> – This is the Career Resource Library's web page, formerly Career InfoNet. The library offers articles on career exploration, job search, education and training, and business and employment.

<http://www.monster.com> - Includes career advice articles on: job search basics, resume and letter writing, behavioral-based interviewing, careers at 50+, networking, and assessing your strengths. Allows you to develop a resume online and make it available to employers who are looking for those skills.

Internet Job Search

<http://www.careerbuilder.com> – Includes articles on: job search, getting hired, who's hiring, cover letters and resumes, changing jobs, and career test. Also allows you to upload and paste your resume.

<http://www.job-hunt.org> – Is a free, online job search guide with links to over 10,000 employers and resources. Includes sections on layoff help, job search advice, job search news, job search sites and career resources. Also includes a link to Workforce50 – employers who value experience and looking for employees.
